

of Urban Design”: “Urban design . . . is a ‘way of thinking.’ It is not about separation and simplification but rather about synthesis. It attempts . . . to deal with the full reality of the urban situation, not the narrow slices seen through disciplinary lenses.” This open-ended, nonhierarchical stance should make urban design a leading part of impending environmental work.